ABSTRACT

This article outlines the wisdom of the Tatar Sunda customary community in preserving the functions of forests that can contribute to climate change mitigation efforts that occur. As we know, forest destruction that has occurred has caused many impacts on the lives of living things, including climate change. The existence of forests for customary law communities is essentially not just a natural resource that they can use but is their identity in life and life. Forest damage that occurs can disturb the cosmic balance of life of the living creature itself.

This paper is the result of a study that uses a sociological juridical approach method that uses primary data as the main data besides secondary data. Field studies are conducted to obtain primary data through interview and observation techniques. Data analysis was carried out by qualitative analysis until conclusions were deduced.

The results of this study explain that the efforts of customary law communities in the preservation of forest functions are carried out through the determination of the division of forest protection and management areas which are
